Abstract:

Extraterritoriality in East Asia examines the approaches of China, Japan and South Korea to exercising legal authority over crimes committed outside their borders, known as ‘extraterritorial jurisdiction’. It considers themes of justiciability and approaches to international law, as well as relevant examples of legislation and judicial decision-making, to offer a deeper understanding of the topic from the perspective of this legally, politically and economically significant region.

Speakers:

Danielle Ireland-Piper, Associate Professor, The Australian National University.

Danielle Ireland-Piper is Associate Professor at the ANU National Security College and Honorary Adjunct Associate Professor at Bond University Faculty of Law. Her teaching and research expertise includes constitutional law, comparative law, and international law (including space law, citizenship law, human rights, the laws of armed conflict, climate law, and transnational criminal law), as well as the intersection between these areas of law and matters of national security law and policy. Danielle has extensively researched exercises of extraterritoriality in comparative context, particularly as relates to criminal offences. In her capacity as an Honorary Adjunct Associate Professor at Bond University, Danielle is also a member of the Bond University Technology and Jurisdiction Research Team. She has a PhD from the University of Queensland and an LLM from the University of Cambridge, where she was a Chevening and Pegasus Scholar. Danielle also has experience in government and in private legal practice.
