Copyright Policy

The Society does not normally require copyright to be assigned for work published in the Journal. This may enable publication in the Journal of work intended to be published elsewhere (subject to any publisher's necessary permission). The Society does require any subsequent publication elsewhere to acknowledge previous publication in the Journal. Persons seeking permission to copy work published in the Journal may inquire directly of the author, or the Editor who will pass the inquiry to the appropriate person.

Although it does not require copyright to be assigned, the Society does require that it be granted a licence to republish any work published in the Journal online on appropriate websites, because unless authors grant such a licence, the Journal cannot be published online. Authors will be taken to have granted the licence by submitting their works for publication.

A Note from the Editors

This is the final issue of the Journal to be published under the title Australasian Journal of Legal Philosophy. From 2020 (vol 45), the Journal will be published under the new title Journal of Legal Philosophy by Edward Elgar Publishing in partnership with the Australasian Society of Legal Philosophy. There will be two issues of the rebadged journal each year.

The name change reflects an aspiration to seek an enhanced international profile and readership for the Journal. We hope our readers will support this initiative by submitting their work to the rebadged journal and encouraging their colleagues and students to do likewise. The Journal will remain under the stewardship of the current editorial team in its new format.
